Straw poll

From Wikipedia, the free encyclopedia

For Wikipedia policy on straw polls, see Wikipedia:Straw polls.

A straw poll is an informal type of voting where the results of the poll have little or no direct results, other than to gauge opinion. Straw polls are commonly used in American political caucuses, where the primary goals are to select delegates and vote on resolutions. The results of the straw polls may or may not influence the delegates as they participate in political conventions after the caucus.
